DESCRIPTION:

A walled patio sandwiched between the legs of an L-shaped facade organizes the design of this Spanish Colonial Revival house. It is one and two stories in height, capped by tiled hip and gable roofs, and clothed in stucco. A two story square bay at the center of the plan acts as a sort of "tower" and is crowned by a finial in the shape of a miniature cupola. Typical Spanish characteristics employed in the design include an arcaded balcony articulated with pilasters and impost moldings; a molded cornice line; a variety of window treatments such as shuttered casements, a hooded front window, and a casement with a segmental arch head; and a perforated stucco grille. Old newspaper photographs reveal that the house is essentially unchanged, although the palm that grows out of the courtyard is substantially larger.
